THERE ARE NO PREREQUISITES REQUIRED FOR THIS COURSE. This course is an interdisciplinary introduction to the history, theory, form, function, and culture of video games. The class will perform both a formal and theoretical analyses on games from differing genres and platforms. It will focus on the aesthetic strategies game designers use to impart certain meanings to the player. It also will situate games historically through an analyses of the ideological values encoded within games, including, but not limited to, race, gender, and sexuality.

This class uses the Heath Anthology, 6th edition, v. E, as the main guide to trace an evolution of American literature through the works of ethnically diverse women, African Americans, Native Americans, Asian Americans, and Mexican Americans. The overarching literary and artistic movement that has accompanied this evolution is postmodernism. The theories of postmodernism since approximately the early 1970s have broken down the idea of a central "white" literary perspective and tradition, and have made American literature much more inclusive of a broad range of voices. Our main goal will be to examine how ethnicity, race, and gender have (re)shaped American literature and produced diverse social and political perspectives from positions that had been traditionally powerless. The diverse perspectives are the main emphasis.

This course covers a selection of William Shakespeare's comedies, histories, and tragedies. We will think about what these plays had to say to their original Elizabethan audiences on political, social, economic, and philosophical questions. We will also consider how these plays have been interpreted in our own day, and how they speak to such questions now. Required Texts: The Norton Shakespeare: Essential Plays and The Bedford Companion to Shakespeare.

Spend the summer writing your own stories in Life Writing. In this class, we'll look at several genres of life writing including memoir, travel writing, and auto-ethnography. We'll read writers like Amy Tan, David Foster Wallace, and Cheryl Strayed, examining at how they write their own true stories, so that you can write nonfiction tales of your life. You'll write several short to medium creative essays, while also engaging in class wide discussions of your work and the work of published authors.

This course will provide students with knowledge to succeed at a research university. Students will consider what it means to have a liberal arts education and will learn about motivation, resiliency, and self-advocacy. Students will reflect on their current work toward academic success and their path to graduation. For more information, contact Cynthia Demetriou at cyndem@email.unc.edu.

The program will focus on building skills necessary for designing and implementing sustainable financing and governance systems for water and other environmental projects. Program will include a mix of classroom sessions, field visits, guest lectures, and service learning project work. This course looks at the difficult ¿how to pay¿ questions related to water resources management and other environmental services by examining the strategies, systems, and tools that societies, governments, and communities use to pay for environmental programs and services. This course, traditionally taught at UNC, is open to graduate students, recent graduates, and select advanced undergraduates. Past course participants have included students from the Department of Environmental Sciences & Engineering, Public Administration, and the Department of City and Regional Planning. Program and course fees are currently being finalized, and are somewhat flexible. Program cost will depend on the number of course credits selected and service projects. Anticipated cost for UNC students with NC residency, excluding airfare: $4,000 to $6,000. There are substantial grants and funding options available through the Institute for the Study of the Americas, the Carolina Center for Public Service, and the School of Public Health. Please submit a program application here: https://unc.azl.qualtrics.com/SE/?SID=SV_5gWp85l0C5NQAkX. Contact us for more information at seroyste@live.unc.edu
